It's that time of year again: time to seriously consider how you want to spend your summer travel budget. You could certainly fall back on the established classics, revisit old haunts or wait to be influenced by some jet-set Instagrammer, or you could set the trend yourself and try something new.

Now, there's no shortage of hotel openings in the coming months, thanks in part to two years of pandemic delays, so you've got plenty of choices. Whether your dream vacation includes sipping wine in California, sitting on a beach in the Caribbean or strolling through a European capital, we've got you covered.

And if you think you've seen all New York City has to offer, think again.

Casa Polanco, Mexico City

The food, the art and the culture. Those are the three reasons most people visit Mexico City. Here's a fourth: Casa Polanco. Poised to become one of the city's go-to boutique hotels when it opens in June after a meticulous four-year restoration, the design-forward Casa Polanco will offer just 19 suites and a prime central location. Originally a private residence built in the 1940s, the current owners set out to create a guest experience that feels like staying in the home of a friend (but with 5-star service). Oh, and this friend also has exquisite taste. Throughout the suites and common spaces, like the interior courtyard and park-facing library, you'll find objects from Mexican bazaars alongside artwork and custom furniture from Mexico City-based artisans.
